Hyaluronic Acid Microspheres

Between cosmetics and aesthetic medicine

Wrinkles can be defined as a laceration of the elastic tissues and collagen combined with a decrease in the skin's fundamental substances.

Hyaluronic Acid
Aged skin Young skin

In 1933 Meyer and Palmer identified a viscous component in the vitreous humor found in bovine eyes. After having analyzed it they classified it as part of the polysaccharide family and named it hyaluronic acid. (from the Greek hyalos=glass)

From the 1950's it was used to treat eyes.

It started to be used for aesthetic medicine and cosmetics in the 2000's as an active principle with a filling and anti-ageing effect.

Hyaluronic acid is a GAG (glycosaminoglycan) a polysaccharide with a high molecular weight and is the chief component of the extracellular matrix which is found mainly in skin.

Hyaluronic acid microspheres are used in aesthetic medicine in a non-invasive way which uses filler techniques.

Hyaluronic microspheres are composed of two types of hyaluronic acid, with both high and low molecular weight, biocompatible.

Once they reach the depths of a wrinkle, the microspheres progressively re-hydrate themselves by drawing water that evaporates thanks to TEWL. (transepidermal water loss).
